Choose your ending! Don't Drink and Drive!

Graduation — your teenager has talked of nothing else for months. But now the big day is fast approaching, along with another inevitable celebration: the after-grad party. As a parent, it's up to you to give some serious advice to your children so that their memories of this important event are only happy and positive ones.

Raise awareness

Emphasize that it isn't necessary to drink alcohol in order to have fun. Mention the dangers of excessive drinking, which can so easily ruin the celebration that your teenagers have been waiting for so intently. Encourage your sons and daughters to decide on the way they will behave in advance.

If the teenagers don't have a car, ensure that they know who will bring them home before they leave for the dance.

Assure your children that if their transportation plans change, they should call you for a ride. This is especially important if their designated driver starts drinking. Make sure that the kids have enough money to call a taxi, if that is the safest way to get home.

Repeat as often as necessary that they should not, under any circumstances, drive after drinking or get in a car driven by someone who is drunk.

Be proactive

At all times, but particularly during the weeks preceding the graduation formal, parents should set an example by drinking in moderation. These days, many parents are getting together to provide a carpooling service for all the graduates. Be the moving force behind this idea, or volunteer to be one of the evening's chauffeurs. It's for a good cause!
